A sharp-voiced white man, whom we learned afterwards to call the "Wasp," because he always flew nervously about, stinging the sprawling negroes into activity, thrust himself among the laborers. Twenty stings from his voice, and the darkey forms plunged into the darkness beyond the gangways. Then other torches were placed upon the bank,—and long wood piles appeared. The Wasp flitted restlessly from deck to shore, while the negroes attacked the wood-piles, and, each taking half a dozen sticks, hurried to the deck with them. Presently there the singers were amused at the sound of their own voices. The Wasp, always kindly and well-disposed towards the negroes, despite his rough ways, broke into appeal, threat, and entreaty, when one of the darkies stumbled or lagged. Then it was that he cried raspingly, "You, Reuben!" "You, Black Hawk!" "Just so. All for the good of society with an oath. "Come on there, you Washington! ain't you going to hear me!" Sometimes the Wasp sped among me!" Sometimes the Wasp sped among the negroes, singing them into such ac-tivity that a whole wood-pile vanished Wasp, calling the palpitating wood-carriers around him, thus addressed them, "Now, you boys, listen. You Black Hawk, do you hear, you and these three, first watch! You, Reuben, and these three, second watch!" etc. The 'orches were dipped in the river, the light hissed dying defiance at the dark.

Scottish Games at Oban.

A correspondent describes the annual celebration of the national games of Scotland at Oban, a favorite watering place near Glasgow. These games conplace near Glasgow. These games consist of manly sports, throwing the hammer, wrestling, running, walking, boxing, throwing and lifting heavy weights, and are presided over by the lords of the estates, and by them the prizes are awarded. The gentry of the neighboring counties attend, and in the evening a bell and a display of forms.
